Uranium, Commission Reports WASHINGTON, D.C. - A new process of extracting bomb-making uranium from phosphate rocks as by-product of fertilizer producion was announced recently by the atomic energy commission. With the new development, uranium in phosphate deposits "can be extracted economically in the production of highly refined fertilize known as triple superphosphate, the commission said.

It has been known for some time that uranium occurs "as a very minor component" in the phosphate deposits in the northwest and in "Considerable research work has been done to develop a process whereby uranium can be extracted economically from these very lowgrade sources," the A.E.C. said. "It is hoped that the new process will open up this new source o uranium. The process is classified secret and cannot be described."
